Steven Cramer

These poems represent three tendencies in my writing. "First Snow" strives to be naturalistic, to describe something that happened as clearly as possible and state for the record as honestly as possible how I (the speaker) reacted. If the speaker (me) comes off as a bit of a jerk, so be it. "I Wanted to Write a Poem . . ." at first tried, and failed, to behave like "First Snow"; that is, I labored to describe what I saw at the Tate. Early drafts lay inert on the page, needing some other dimension. Two things happened that allowed me to complete the poem: first, I owned up to my struggle to write it, which gave the description an emotional impulse; second, I found myself swerving into the Paolo and Francesca story. It's not for me to judge whether these elements--especially the reflexivity of a poem "about" itself--succeed, but I will say that I've never understood the taboo against "poems about poetry"; writing poems is something poets do often (or should). How can it help but form a crucial subject for them? "Untitled Events," I hope, creates a mood--paranoia, mainly--while leaving the narrative context for that mood up for grabs.

Untitled Events

The river iced over to a black stripe overnight. A half-mile off, shouts from the hospital: people hurrying across the frozen park, the sky a blue so dull it's barely a color. Women lie awake next to men who've shared their beds for years.
Before the playground's dirt hardened, the Turner boy dug rows of holes with a spade.
Men cross the street to avoid scaring women.
Some keep notes. Some write letters and numbers in sequences. The sky turns white, naked, veined. You described the atmosphere as poison taken in with every breath.
Knots of people, nodding, on each other's porches—everyone expecting to get through the night without waking up as news.

First Snow

If he'd killed her, it would've been her fault was my first thought the night Hilary stepped backward into the path of a passing van.
Outside Peking Garden, Charlotte straddled a stone lion's neck, ordering me to watch, Daddy, watch, as Hilary locked our car, then dangled then troubled then jammed her keys into her bag—a fiddling diffidence with life's kid-proof caps, its Allen wrenches versus Stillson wrenches, its menus, its remotes, that drives me wild, finds me hectoring her, joylessly, to look, will you? Look. . .

The lion's mane glared with ice. Thus,

I stood in a half-turn on the curb, swerving van, its horn blasting, about a forearm's length outside the future Hilary had nearly turned to fate, threads of breath rising over her face—beautiful at this stage in her aging—the driver possibly cursing stupid bitch, low beams peering askew into the warp of white flakes, first snow to accumulate this winter, with more predicted.

I Wanted To Write A Poem About The Blind Group Permitted To Touch The Kiss.

I started writing the poem by trying to get right how their practiced hands branched, like ivy, along the calves, knees, thighs. Her breasts, his trunk.

And because the lovers are both lovers and lovers embracing sin—Paolo’s right palm on Francesca’s hip, the curve of their spines exposed—I tried to fit in my dream of Hell, sweating wind buffeting Satan’s leaves from his yard into mine; my penalty to rake eternally.

It didn’t fit. Then I wanted to add what some say we do the moment we first see The Kiss: a fast glance over our shoulders, thinking: anybody watching me? The Book of Lancelot and Guinevere drops from Paolo’s fingertips: a romance Francesca calls a pimp. I wanted my poem to end with the scrabbling hands that found the book, felt it, then tried to reach the kiss. But The Kiss isn’t a kiss. It’s the instant her husband, his brother, interrupts, just as their lips don’t touch.
